

How do you turn 20 separate logistics programs into one seller strategy?

We had plenty of programs. What we didn't have was a way to talk about them as one solution.

- Transformation Experience
- Executive-Level Scope
- Business Results

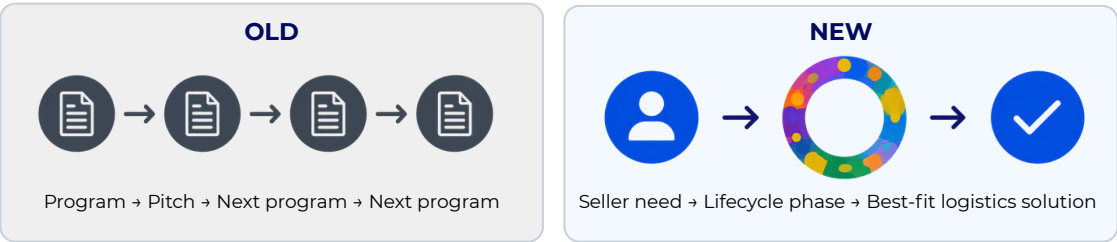

Everyone was starting with WFS.

The pattern kept showing up: introduce Walmart Fulfillment Services first, then say “If that’s not the right solution for you, look at this.” The unintended message was that everything else was a consolation prize.

We had started the project to get seller-facing associates to speak consistently about Marketplace Logistics, but it was stalled because no one could figure out how to position the portfolio.

So I stopped thinking about programs.

The north star became simple.

Present a holistic logistics solution without making any program sound more important than another.

Whenever the work started drifting back toward old habits, I didn't debate the individual change. I asked: Does this bring us closer to the goal or farther from it?

That gave a large cross-functional team a shared decision rule without requiring me to make every decision.

We built one language across the experience.

The framework became the foundation for both associate learning and seller-facing materials. I personally built the framework and wrote the core copy. Instructional designers, product and program SMEs, brand designers, Marketing, Legal and copy reviewers helped bring it to life.

How it comes to life is their discretion. What comes to life is not.

- Is it accurate?

Did I learn the goal?

WHAT I'M PROUD OF

We moved incredibly fast without turning it into “Katie’s project.” We brought people along, challenged familiar ways of thinking, and crossed the finish line together.

MY GUIDING PRINCIPLE

Alignment doesn't require agreement on every decision. It requires agreement on how decisions get made.

IF I HAD A DO-OVER

I wouldn't manufacture one. I'm genuinely happy with how we approached this project.

AT A GLANCE

20 logistics programs

8 seller lifecycle phases

3 months kickoff → launch

13+ partner groups

WHY THIS STORY

This shows how I create clarity when there isn't a single right answer. I can bring competing perspectives together, establish a shared decision rule, and turn ambiguity into something an organization can actually use.

This story also demonstrates:

Strategic thinking

Simplifying complexity

Influence without authority

Cross-functional leadership

Enterprise execution

IF WE TALK, ASK ME ABOUT

The assumption I was most worried the SMEs would prove wrong.

What would have made the three-month timeline fail.

How I knew we had enough alignment to stop debating and start building.

The tradeoff I made between speed and broader stakeholder involvement.

What leadership needed to see before they backed the change..
